Product Description

Products Description

Why does stainless steel turn yellow after high temperatures?

Stainless steel is prone to forming metal oxides and carbides at high temperatures, which are difficult to remove and can cause the surface to turn yellow or black, affecting its appearance and even the service life of the material.

How to solve the problem of stainless steel turning yellow after high temperatures?

Choosing good quality stainless steel materials, reducing the content of pollutants in high temperature fumes, and adopting appropriate surface treatment methods can effectively prevent and avoid the problem of stainless steel turning yellow after high temperatures, ensuring the appearance and service life of stainless steel.

High temperature anti-yellowing process stainless steel is suitable for industries such as kitchen appliances, steam and baking equipment that do not exceed 500°C in contact temperature.
